FOREWORD

WITH the first quarter of the Twentieth Century, an immense wave of interest in things Colonial began to sweep over the country where formerly had been complete indifference and neglect. Architects, having tried a bit of Gothic, some Queen Anne and a great deal of so-called classic architecture, thinking people slowly awoke to the realization that here in America was a chaste and perfect type, a form which belonged peculiarly to the nation and had been wrought by long years of experience and effort; of struggle and of trial.

Half a century ago but little interest was shown in Colonial history, still less in the architecture of that era. The Colonial period—historically, traditionally and architecturally—was considered quite dull and rather vague. Few took the trouble to study it—none, to understand. The dramatic incidents that marked as vital the two hundred years prior to the end of the British Empire in America were almost ignored regardless of the fact that it was during those two centuries that the houses that now command such admiration in Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina were erected.

Born of virtual necessity, Colonial architecture in the South was the outcome of a desire on the part of the Colonists to follow as closely as possible the contemporaneous architecture of the England they had loved and left. These Colonists were students—thinkers—artists. Always, they seemed to strive toward the fulfilment of an ideal. The dwellings that they left radiate the warmth of feeling that inspired them and reflect not only an appreciation of the beautiful brought overseas by their cultivated builders but voice the quiet, dignified and powerful qualities characteristic of the men who made the nation. They display a careful, studied solution of a difficult problem and today may be considered with profit by both professional and amateur.

It has been said that the early craftsmen of the South lacked the fine execution of detail found in New England houses. Sincere investigation will, however, prove that not only is the South a region of original and characteristic modes of building but that its architecture stands true to the memory of the highest Colonial tradition. In the South a knowledge of architecture was an important part of every gentleman's education and the dwellings erected were the natural outcome of the manorial scale of living the planters enjoyed.

COLONIAL INTERIORS, SECOND SERIES

Southern houses were not always affairs of great expense given over to master-builders. They were much too personal for that and today these old prototypes are of distinct importance to architecture. They bear witness that their owners were not only persons of wealth but of culture and both within and without show consistent study and individuality. Their lines are honest and sincere, their proportions excellent and their interior detail—bold and yet restrained—is interesting in quality and scale. Their paneling is put together with great care and each carved ornament, every decorative detail shows the practiced hand of workmen who spared neither time nor effort to achieve the best results.

Houses with outstretching wings connected with covered arcades are characteristic of the South—Virginia, in particular. As on the exterior of Virginia dwellings of the Colonial period, symmetry prevails upon the interior. Almost always the walls are clothed with paneling and no home was too small for the formality of a central hall, few too large for cordial hospitality. Some plain—almost forbidding exteriors—display within the walls enchanting examples of carved ornamentation whose rigid scale and refinement are said to be the best in America. In some of the "great houses" the ceilings are of extraordinary height. In smaller buildings they are rather low but in all the proportions are satisfying. The interiors with vigorous, original detail all show dignity and charm and though somewhat unconventional at times, are in every instance well-studied and present examples of woodwork unrestrained in design.

In the South, Colonial designers and craftsmen found many outlets for their talents and here they wrought in both brick and wood to achieve a domestic architecture of beauty, interest and individuality. Unfortunately, in all but isolated instances, the names of those who handled so happily the plumb-line and T-Square have been lost.

As the Colonists of Maryland were much in accord with those of Virginia and like the latter lived on vast plantations, it is but natural that the early architecture of these two states should have much in common. Lives of individual isolation were enjoyed by the most notable men of both colonies. Annapolis and Williamsburg were miniature English towns and their buildings show, probably, the most perfect form of early Colonial architecture. In Maryland one finds, perhaps, the highest ceilings and richest interior embellishment of any Colonial province. Not only are the compositions good, but the delicacy of the intricately carved woodwork is amazing.

In North Carolina, on the other hand, one finds in New Bern a town which is to that state what Salem is to Massachusetts. This, too, is a river town, a little city whose ancient dwellings are none too well-known and whose beauties have never been adequately portrayed. In certain New Bern houses one observes the finest type of old American woodwork and this is hand-hewn and carved from brittle, long leaf, native pine. It has been found difficult to place with accuracy the date of the erection of these North Carolina dwellings of interesting proportions and undeniable charm for even tradition regarding their building is unsatisfactorily indefinite. It is known, however, that James Coor, an English builder, and John Hawks, from the island of Malta, plied the architectural trade in this province in the middle of the eighteenth century. Coor's work is considered more like that of New England than of the South and his name has frequently been compared with that of Samuel McIntyre of Salem.

The interiors of Southern Colonial houses express not only a sincere love for the beautiful—for the arts—but reflect—at times with severity—the limitations of their early builders. Their fine state of preservation after two centuries or more bears testimony to the sincerity of their designers and the quality of the materials used in their construction.

For the generous cooperation of the owners of the houses illustrated in this volume, the author would record most hearty appreciation. Sincere thanks are also due Mr. William Lawrence Bottomley, Mr. Bedford Brown, IV, Mr. Fiske Kimball, Mr. Philip Stern, Mr. Kenneth Clark, Mr. Lawrence Kocher, Mr. Russell Whitehead, Mr. T. C. Parker, Mr. L. W. Ballou and Mr. Archie J. Streat for highly valued architectural aid. To The Thomas Jefferson Memorial Foundation, The Metropolitan Museum of Art, Mrs. Richard Duffy, Miss Adelaide Fries, Mr. Swepson Earle and the John Wallace Gillies Studio, grateful acknowledgment is made for assistance in photographic and historical research.

INTRODUCTION

CONSIDERING the large amount of Colonial Architecture that exists in this country to-day, it is surprising that such a comparatively small amount has been definitely recorded in book form. This is to be regretted, for not every architect or designer is able to seek out for himself the existing examples of early work which offer so much in the way of suggestion and inspiration to-day.

In presenting Colonial Interiors, Second Series, the author, Edith Tunis Sale, has placed before the profession a remarkable collection of truly excellent examples which well illustrate the early architecture of Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina.

The architecture of these states is of particular interest, because it displays certain characteristics not found in the Colonial work of New England and the northern states. Notable among these are a greater dignity of scale, a more scholarly conception in the way of design, and a peculiarly tenacious persistence of the characteristics of English Georgian architecture.

This book is a definite and valuable contribution to the all too small group of standard works concerning the early architecture of the thirteen original colonies of the United States. The author has evidently chosen her subject matter with great care, and there is scarcely a plate in the book which does not offer valuable suggestions to the designer. A feature of special value, particularly to those who find interest in the chronological development of our early architecture, is the affixing of a date to each example.
